

Marriages Matter

An ages-old institution faces new challenges.

By: Archbishop Joseph E. Kurtz

The

on in, Father! We've been looking forward to seeing you." clear about divorce, same-sex unions, contraception, The feeling was mutual. As I stepped into the living room cohabitation, and all the contentious issues that surround and greeted the couples gathered there, I felt grateful for marriage today. On the other hand, we wanted to be our friendship.

We had met some years earlier on an Engaged Encounter weekend. They were preparing for marriage then; I was on Searching for Supports. In the course of this project, we friendship grew over the years.

to offer and how they reached out to others. I always left clamoring for attention. those gatherings feeling enriched.

they live. I am always deeply grateful for—and impressed Pennsylvania coal town, benefited greatly by the fact that by—their witness, because it's no secret that married their family, church, and neighborhood all overlapped and couples and the very institution of marriage are facing great supported one another. pressures and challenges.

States launched the National Pastoral Initiative for all gathered to eat, connect, and share about the day's Marriage. Together with lay people and clergy, social events and accomplishments. Even if we were out playing scientists and theologians, we want to help strengthen ball with friends, we knew we had to be home by 5:30. The marriage and to support couples in the call to live out the other families in our neighborhood did the same, so it felt and inspiration for (www.foryourmarriage.org).

door I was privileged to oversee this project for a number of swung open at my years, and I have to admit that it was a bit of a roller knock, and a young man greeted me with a hearty, "Come coaster. On the one hand, we bishops wanted to be very understanding and supportive, offering pastoral help for grasping and living out the high calling of marriage.

the retreat team working with two married couples to give consulted with two hundred focus groups made up of presentations and offer direction. When that retreat ended, couples at every stage of marriage. A number of people in five of the participating couples decided to keep getting these groups brought up the topic of support—or, to be together. They invited me to their reunions, and so our more precise, the lack of it. As one person put it: "Once our wedding was over, I had this feeling that, in the eyes of the church, we were a completed project." Hearing this, I As these men and women opened their hearts and homes to thought to myself: "Wow! That's how I felt sometimes me, I witnessed some of their joys and challenges. I saw when I was preparing couples for marriage!" It wasn't that them move into marriage, begin families, and work to raise I didn't care anymore. Rather, it was the feeling of their children. I heard about their difficulties and their need accomplishment that comes when any important goal is for support. I saw how much wisdom and insight they had met—especially when so many other important things are Still, I can understand why couples might feel unsupported Marriage Matters. Over the years, I have been blessed to as they launch into marriage and family life. It used to be know many couples like these—"real" people who that society offered them many built-in supports. My demonstrate the meaning of Christian marriage by the way parents, who raised their five children in a little

For instance, the evening meal was an important part of our This is why, in 2005, the Catholic bishops of the United family life, and we kids knew it. It was the time when we grace of their sacramental commitment. Last November's natural. I also remember how neighbors would get together pastoral letter, Marriage: Love and Life in the Divine Plan, on the front porch on warm summer evenings. The children was one of our projects; so is a Web site with resources, played, the adults talked about local happenings, sports, married life and politics, and a sense of community was built.

Today, however, this kind of community support is hard to a third as much. "I was traveling all over the world, but I find. It's still vital for family life, but in most places, it wasn't seeing my children grow up," he told me. doesn't just happen anymore. It has to be developed, with couples taking the lead to build the kind of community that And sometimes, you sense that same heroic quality in the will help them the most.

accept the things I cannot change, the courage to change sacrifices, they found great joy in Georgie. the things I can, and the wisdom to know the difference." Every day I pray the longer version, which ends with the I experienced that, too, when George came to live with me an invitation to reflect on our expectations.

heightened expectations of what marriage should be like, hidden best in those around him. Young people, especially, have great expectations of personal fulfillment. But unless they also have a developed Too Hard? Pope Benedict XVI once observed that there paralyzed with fear of getting hurt. This mindset can might say that, in practice, they are atheists. present a significant challenge to a marriage.

discover this!"

God calls every Christian couple to an intimate communion supply everything we need. n of love that reflects the life of the Trinity. That's a high expectation indeed! But as with every vocation, it's The Most Reverend Joseph E. Kurtz, DD, is Archbishop of expectations in line with yours?

The key, I believe, is to have expectations that move us out of ourselves rather than inward. Along these lines, I found it interesting that more than one couple in our focus groups said that their relationship grew when they started doing some kind of service together. In other words, it's by looking outward that we find the personal fulfillment we seek. If we become self-absorbed, we risk losing sight of the joyful gift of self that is at the heart of every vocation.

Quiet Heroes. Sometimes, you recognize this joyful, sacrificial love when a person makes a decision that seems somewhat surprising. I remember a father who gave up a fast-paced, high-paying job and took another that paid only more quiet, day-to-day choices a couple makes. I think of how my father supported us as a coal miner. And how A Question of Expectations. One goal of the bishops' devotedly both my parents cared for my brother, George, initiative is to discover how Catholics today understand who was born with Down syndrome and lived with them marriage. As I talk with people about this, I sometimes into adulthood. I would be the last person to minimize the think of the popular prayer: "God, grant me the serenity to challenges involved, but I know that along with the phrase: "So that I might be reasonably happy in this life after our mother's death. He moved into the rectory, and supremely happy with you forever in the next." I became an active worker in the parish and treated everyone always laugh over that word "reasonably"—but really, it's as family. Parishioners would tell me, "We miss you when you go on vacation, but we really miss Georgie." Always, until his death in 2002, my brother was an infallible sign of In my conversations, I have often been struck by people's God's presence—a person who brought out the heroic, sense of God's grace in their lives, they will assume that are some people who profess faith in God but then act as if everything depends on them and may become almost God doesn't exist and everything depends on them. You

Let's not fall into this trap. It's true that we face many What happens when a couple hits the inevitable bumps in challenges today. But it would be a mistake—a heresy, in the road? They will be very disappointed and even fact—to think that everything rests on our shoulders. disillusioned if they expect their spouse to be that perfect Essentially, renewing marriage and family life is God's soul mate who never lets them down. "Yes, we do marry work! Our part is to serve his plan as faithfully as possible our soul mates," I once heard a wise couple say. "But it's at and to cooperate with the movements of grace as he gives the end of the marriage and not the beginning that we them to us. God is calling us, each in our own way, to be witnesses to the goodness and beauty of his plan for marriage. It's a prophetic role, and it takes courage. First It's not a question of expecting little or nothing. After all, and foremost, then, let us look to God. He will surely essential to pray and ask, What do you want, Lord? Are my Louisville, Kentucky. He headed the United States bishops' Committee on Marriage and Family from 2005 to 2009 and now chairs their Ad Hoc Committee for the Defense of Marriage.

> Reprinted with permission of The Word Among Us. 9639 Dr. Perry Rd #126N, Ijamsville, MD 21754. Issue date June 2010, www.wau.org, 1-800-775-9673